The authors concede the individual superiority of the German ships, but also note that between 1908 and 1918 the RN built and operated fourteen battlecruisers to confront just seven German ones. The British also demonstrated superior preparedness, or 'recovery' time: two months after Jutland the RN had seven barttlecruisers available whereas the Kaiserliche Marine could only muster one.

British and German Battlecruisers: Their Development and ...

Germany's first response to British battlecruisers was the Von der Tann. Whereas the British favored larger guns and speed, the Germans took a more balanced approach. Their early battlecruisers were better protected and as fast but with 11-inch guns vs. the Invincibles' 12-inch armament. German battlecruisers often withstood punishment from even 15-inch guns.

The British battlecruisers became engaged with both their German counterparts, the battlecruisers, and then German battleships before the arrival of the battleships of the British Grand Fleet. The result was a disaster for the Royal Navy's battlecruiser squadrons: Invincible, Queen Mary, and Indefatigable exploded with the loss of all but a handful of their crews. [64]

Battlecruiser - Wikipedia

The battlecruiser was the brainchild of Admiral Sir John Fisher, the man who had sponsored the construction of the world's first "all big gun" warship, HMS Dreadnought. He visualised a new breed of warship with the armament of a battleship, but faster, lighter, and less heavily armoured. The first three battlecruisers, the Invincible class, were laid down while Dreadnought was being built in 1906. This design philosophy was most successful in action when the battlecruisers could use their speed

British and German Battlecruisers: Their Development and ...

The Kaiserliche Marine, the navy of the German Empire, built a series of battlecruisers in the first half of the 20th century. The battlecruiser type was an outgrowth of older armored cruiser designs; they were intended to scout for the main battle fleet and attack the reconnaissance forces of opposing fleets. Kaiser Wilhelm II insisted that the new battlecruisers be able to fight in the line of battle with battleships to counter Germany's numerical inferiority. SMS Von der Tann was the first Ge

German battlecruisers were sent out on some successful independent expeditions. They bombarded towns on the British east coast, raising concerns among the British public about the Royal Navy's ability to protect them. The Germans gave a battlecruiser, the SMS Goeben, to the Ottoman Empire. It contributed to bringing the Turks into the war and helped them fight against British and Russian fleets.
